

High Fidelity MockUp Report

Changes

We wanted to make sure to supply an application that would be user-friendly along with having that ease of use feature. In doing so, we realized some changes needed to be made in order to seamlessly transition from our low fidelity into our high fidelity mockup. During our user testing, we ran into some problems that need to be changed in order to make a better user experience. We got rid of some screens, created additional screens, and changed some existing screens. The biggest changes included getting rid of the organize client information screen and in-app messaging. When our participants were doing their user testing they didn't understand why there would need to be functionality and communication between the vehicle rental company and them. As a group, we decided to get rid of functionality for the car rental companies and communication with them. Instead, we are offering our clients a different way that they can contact the company if need be. We decided to place an information tab on each vehicle posting that will include the rental company's name, address, phone number, and email. This will allow the user to call, text, or email the company with any questions or concerns that they may have.

The second major issue that we had with our application and user testing was that participants had a hard time understanding the difference between fleet and book now. Fleet was designed to be a button where a user would be able to see all the cars that Vicci Transport had to offer. Book now was designed to allow users to book a vehicle based on location, date, and price range. In order to reduce confusion we decided to combine the two functionalities of these buttons into one. Now when users click on book now they will be taken to a screen that shows all of the cars that are offered on the Vicci Transport application. Once they are ready, they can change location, date, and price range in order to filter the vehicles shown to their specifications. They can then select their desired car and book a reservation. Our hope is that this will cause less confusion. After we finish our high fidelity mockups we want to test the usability of this button with additional participants to make sure they understand the functionality.

The last big change that we implemented was a notification bell that would take users to their unread notifications within the application. Originally we had a screen of what it would look like if the user receives a notification but no way for them to view it. Our idea is that when the user clicks on the bell they can see and open their unread notifications. Once they open the notification it will be deleted so the app is less cluttered for the user. Finally, we added some small changes such as editing buttons, stars, and submission buttons that we had originally forgotten to draw in our low fidelity mockups. Overall, we believe that our application has greatly improved and hope to do some more user testing in order to further test our high fidelity designs before they are implemented. As a group, we collaborated on Adobe XD to create each individual screen in this document.
